CURIOSITY

Rosé wines are certainly not obtained by mixing white and red wine! There are three systems for the production of rosé wine: through the use of slightly pigmented black berried grapes, which are low in tannins; through the use of black and white berried grapes trying to obtain the right mix of color, or through the brief contact of the black berried grapes with the must, in order to extract little color from the skins. This last method is the one we use for the production of our rosé and, beyond being the most used, it is the one that gives the best results.
